Why Kesha

Kesha Moore, DES is the founder of Rolling With Keke™, an accessibility operations and event strategy consultancy built on a simple principle: access is infrastructure, not an afterthought. With more than two decades inside event and operational environments, she helps leaders see whether the promises they make about access, experience, and inclusion can actually survive real-world delivery.

Her perspective comes from more than one side of the system. She has been the operations professional responsible for making complex work hold, the disabled participant navigating environments that were not built with her body in mind, and the family caregiver advocating alongside someone she loves.

She brings humor, lived experience, and operational receipts to the room, and she is willing to say the quiet part out loud.

Flagship Speaking Topics

1. Accessibility Is Operational Infrastructure

Accessibility works best when it is built into how the event operates, not added at the end. This session shows where access decisions live before show day.

- Find access decisions inside existing workflows
- Bring access into budgets and vendor conversations
- Spot breakdowns before attendees experience them

2. Everybody Means Every Body

Most environments are built around a narrow idea of a “typical” body. This session helps teams plan for real differences in mobility, size, sensory needs, fatigue, and more.

- Challenge assumptions about who the room fits
- Replace guesswork with information and choice
- Protect dignity, independence, and participation

3. Accessibility Has to Survive the Handoffs

Access often breaks when information moves between teams. This session shows how to keep needs, ownership, and follow-through intact from registration through live delivery.

- Trace access across the participant journey
- Clarify ownership when responsibility changes hands
- Verify before the attendee finds the failure

Additional Topics & Audience Fit

The Decisions That Break Access Before Show Day

Access failures often start upstream in venue choices, transportation plans, contracts, budgets, and staffing assumptions.

Dignity, Independence & the Systems We Build

A conversation about support, agency, and what happens when systems make decisions about people instead of with them.

Best-Fit Audiences

- Event and meeting leaders
- Associations and nonprofits
- Destinations, CVBs, venues and hospitality
- Executive and operations teams
- Organizations responsible for participant or visitor experience

What Audiences Leave With

- Language for naming problems earlier
- A stronger lens for ownership and handoffs
- Practical questions to take back to their teams
